EDUCATION PROFESSIONS DEVELOPMENT ACT PROVIDES SPECIAL TRAINING FOR EDUCATIONAL PERSONNEL WORKING WITH THE HANDICAPPED

In recent years the Federal government has become increasingly concerned about the National problem of recruiting and training an adequate number public school teachers. This concern has manifested itself in Federal legislation enacted over the past decade aimed at ameliorating some of these problems.

Much of the Federal legislation enacted although well intentioned and specific in purpose has been in reality less than comprehensive in scope and contained certain restrictive measures which made efficient administration difficult. Congress, in an effort to remedy this situation enacted in 1967, "The Education Professions Development Act" P.L. 90-35. (EPDA) EPDA which amended the Higher Education Act of 1965 - P.L. 89-329, brought together many education programs whose principal purpose is the training of educational personnel.

This legislation has resulted in a functional reorganization of program activities, a commonality of purpose and has encouraged more efficient administration of the teacher manpower training programs. A new agency, the Bureau of Educational Personnel Development (BEPD) was created to administer this program.

In general, the BEPD is charged with expanding, broadening and encouraging innovation in existing programs as well as opening new avenues for coordinating all Federal educational manpower recruiting, training and retraining activities. Included in this effort is a special program to assist in the training of personnel who work with the handicapped.

This issue of "Programs for the Handicapped" will review the program of the BEPD for the handicapped.

BEPD PROGRAM FOR THE HANDICAPPED IN FISCAL YEAR 1969

During the current fiscal year, teachers and other educational personnel who work with handicapped children in regular classrooms in 27 States and the District of Columbia, will receive special training through the BEPD Grant Program.

In all, some 48 grants amounting to nearly $7 million were awarded which represents the largest amount of money for this purpose ever awarded at one time.

Although attention to the education of the handicapped is increasing, an Office of Education study indicates that approximately 60 percent of all handicapped children between five and 17 years of age are not receiving the kind of specialized services that educators now know how to provide. This study, a summary of which was made public last February, is the first national assessment of educational manpower needs.

These youngsters attend regular classes taught by personnel unprepared to meet their special needs. The new grants are for training projects and fellowship programs designed to increase the ability of regular school personnel to recognize and respond to the requirements of handicapped students, and to work in conjunction with highly trained special education specialists so handicapped children can profit from placement in the regular education program.

Recipients of the grants are 33 institutions of higher education, eight local school systems, four State education agencies, and three regional education centers. Specific dollar amounts for each grant will be negotiated. A list of the 48 grants approved for negotiation is included starting on this page. The list includes the name and telephone number of the project director.

This new effort supplements other Office of Education projects designed to recruit and prepare the approximately 237,000 additional teachers and specialists the manpower assessment says are currently needed to provide special services for handicapped children in both special and regular classes.
